BLAMES THE BOARD OF HEALTH FOR LITTLE GIRL'S DEATH

Doctor Claims "Criminal Neglect" Resulted In the Death of Eight-Year-Old Girl—Was Refused Admission To Isolation Hospital—Probe May Result.

An eight-year-old daughter of impoverished parents died of diphtheria last week because in all Chicago, with all its boasted charities, enough anti-toxin to give her strength could not be found.

But from her death there may come an investigation of the Board of Health and the County Hospital that may go farther than the so-called investigation of John Lyons' death at the County Hospital.

The child is Fanny Bard, daughter of Abraham Bard, 3427 W. Twelfth street. He is out of work. And there are still four children to provide for.

About four weeks ago Fanny became stricken with diphtheria. She was taken to the County Hospital. Two weeks later she was sent out of the County Hospital in a condition which the doctors there were pleased to call cured.

A week ago Sunday the girl again became desperately ill with diphtheria. The mother went to Samuel Zak's drug store, Twelfth street and Homan avenue. She needed anti-toxin. But she had no money.

Zak knew the people of Chicago were paying taxes toward the maintenance of the Board of Health to
